Among the plethora of changes coming with Android 10, there's a new API that's particularly useful for screen-recording apps. Google's new OS allows access to internal audio for accessibility purposes (in particular, the company showcased a live-transcribe service for the deaf), but of course, other apps can also utilize the API. ADV Screen Recorder is one of the first apps to take advantage of it to offer internal audio capture on version 4.1.0. What's New- Add support for recording internal audio (Android 10 Required) The app was previously able to record audio via the phone's microphone but the addition of internal audio gives it another dimension. When you activate the new capability, a warning pops up saying it only works when other apps allow audio recording — this makes sense, as regulations across the world forbid capturing phone calls, for example. Still, due to the accessibility aspect of the underlying API, it'll hopefully work in most instances. The new version is currently rolling out on the Play Store. If it's not available to you there, you can also download it over at APK Mirror. It's likely that other screen recording apps will soon add this functionality as well. Wordle beginner's guide: From novice to expert in an afternoon News Applications Android 10 Manuel Vonau joined Android 10 Manuel Vonau in the screen recording apps will soon add this functionality as well. his way up to become the publication's Google Editor. He focuses on Android Police's coverage. He is based in Berlin, Germany. Before joining Android Police, Manuel studied Media and Culture studies in Düsseldorf, finishing his university "career" with a master's degree. After running into connectivity problems with the HTC One S, he quickly switched to a Nexus 4, which he considers his true first Android phone. Since then, he has mostly been faithful to the Google phone lineup, though these days, he is also carrying an iPhone in addition to his Pixel 6. This helps him gain perspective on the mobile industry at large and gives him multiple points of reference in his coverage. Outside of work, Manuel enjoys a good film or TV show, loves to travel, and you will find him roaming one of Berlin's many museums, cafés, cinemas, and restaurants occasionally. More From Manuel Vonau One of the main problems many users encounter when downloading and installing applications to record the Android screen is the interface menus, which are often too complex and large, taking up a large portion of the screen. Basic functions for screen recording This is not the case with ADV Screen Recorder, an application whose developers have made an effort to provide it with a simple design in order to try to be as functional as possible. With it you can record everything that happens on the screen of the device, perfect for video tutorials, and then edit the recording with different tools. It also allows recording with different colors. There are many ways to screen record on Android. Two of the most popular methods include the use of extra third-party accessories which connect to a PC and the use of extra third-party accessories which record screen videos on Android because the other method has never been stable, until now. Screen recording with a program has always been difficult on Android. On previous versions you had to have root access and even then, videos were laggy and low quality. However, a new app has been published to the Play Store called ADV Screen Recorder. Surprisingly, ADV is the best screen recorder app that you can find on Android. It works with majority of Android phones and chipsets and videos are in full resolution. The best thing is that recorded videos do not stutter or lag. Another neat feature of ADV Screen Recorder is the ability to draw and write things in the middle of video recording so if you are making a tutorial, you can write or draw things on the screen and then quickly delete the text. The best thing is that the app does not require root access and works on every Android phone without root and Android 5.0, 5.1 and up. Download ADV Screen Recorder here. Open the app and press the recording button. That is all you have to do to record videos on your Android phone without root.
